Jim spent his working years as a self-employed carpenter, a trade that reflected his independence, skill, and strong work ethic. Though retired, he remained someone who valued staying busy and connected to the people and things he loved. Jim enjoyed bird watching and found peace in observing nature and the simple rhythms of the outdoors. He loved fishing and appreciated the quiet patience and reflection that came with time spent near the water. Being with his family was important to Jim, and he valued time spent together, whether through conversation, shared meals, or simple companionship. He enjoyed visiting the casino, where he liked the atmosphere and the chance to relax and unwind. Jim also liked karaoke and took pleasure in music and the fun of social gatherings. He enjoyed having a drink and sharing stories, laughter, and conversation with those around him. Jim will be remembered for his straightforward nature, his independence, and the quiet ways he showed care for those in his life. His presence will be missed by all who knew him.
