Joel had a rule that he did not acquire more stuff than he could fit in a pickup. His children may have been sofa deprived but were always provided with stack-able plastic chairs with love.

Joel always sent his kids to school with a healthy breakfast of microwaved egg in a cup.

Joel spent his career as a geology programmer for oil companies. His capstone career was to program artillery. He worked with the company that had the contract with Fort Sill that programmed the HMLS (later HIMER system). He was proud of working for the company that could fire a field rocket from Ft. Sill and hit within yards of a target in Dallas.

Joel died while fishing on the Illinois river. He died with minnows in his bucket and a cooler with four empty beer cans. A better end than any of us can expect.

Joel, a right jolly old elf, always had a smile for me and some ridiculous prank to play on me when I was a child visiting "The Lamb's Cabin". Considering I am nearly 20 years younger, I was both delighted and dismayed. Joel, I am raising a metaphoric glass to you and thanking you for treating me like family.
